

modern boxings prizefighting predecessor in which bareknuckled pugilists fought to exhaustion, with fights often lasting several hours

A round ended only when one combatant was floored he then had half a minute's respite before placing his toe on a line scratched across the centre of the ring and resuming battle There were no wins on points those days